UNBEKNOWN to his widowed father and his young sister, who live in the little New England village where he was born, "Sure Thing Johnny" has become a race-track tout. For several years he has been promising his mother that he will come home, right away—just as soon as he completes a big business deal.

After many disappointments, and some weeks of particularly hard luck he chances upon some information that brings undreamed of wealth to himself and friends. He prepares to go home, bids good-bye to his friends, but decides to do a last favor to General Jeff, an old friend who is about to enter the Old Soldiers' Home, and take him to the track.

There the inevitable happens—not to Johnny, but to his aged friend—and once again the visit home is off. But a compensation comes to reward Johnny, and so this story of understandable human humor and pathos has a true-to-life ending.
